

Pho

Pho (Vietnamese: phở^[a] [fɤ̌] [ⓘ]‎^[b]) is a Vietnamese soup dish consisting of broth, rice noodles (bánh phở), herbs, and meat – usually beef (phở bò), and sometimes chicken (phở gà).^{[7][8]} Pho is a popular food in Vietnam^[9] where it is served in households, street-stalls, and restaurants nationwide. Residents of the city of Nam Định were the first to create Vietnamese traditional pho.^[10]

Pho is a relatively recent addition to the country's cuisine, first appearing in written records in the early 20th century^[11] in Northern Vietnam. After the Vietnam War, refugees popularized it throughout the world. Due to limited historical documentation, the origins of pho remain debated. Influences from both French and Chinese culinary traditions are believed to have contributed to its development in Vietnam, as well as to the etymology of its name.^{[12][13][14][11]} The Hanoi (northern) and Saigon (southern) styles of pho differ by noodle width, sweetness of broth, and choice of herbs and sauce.^[15]

In 2017, Vietnam made December 12 the "Day of Pho" (Ngày của Phở).^[16]

History

Phở originated in Northern Vietnam in the early 20th century. It either evolved independently from, or shares a similar origin with, beef noodle soups found in neighboring countries, where dishes such as kuay teow reua of Thailand or ngau naam ho fun (牛腩河粉) and niu pahu (牛扒呼) of Guangdong and Yunnan provinces of China, are common. While the rice noodles and the spices used in the broth of phở have a connection with Chinese culinary traditions, beef consumption was not widespread among the Vietnamese because they traditionally used water buffaloes for farming. The demand for beef only appeared under French colonial rule, leading some to attribute phở's origins to French, Chinese, or a combination of both influences.^[11] However, its exact origins remain a topic of debate.

During French colonial rule (1887–1954), the French introduced pot-au-feu, a slow-cooked beef stew, and the use of beef bones for broth mirrors French consommé techniques.^[17] However dishes with a similar preparation to phở using water buffalo meat, such as xáo trâu have long been staples to the rural cuisine. Villagers in Vân Cù say they ate phở long before the French colonial period.^[18] The modern form emerged between 1900 and 1907 in northern Vietnam,^{[1][12]} southeast of Hanoi in Nam Định

Province, then a substantial textile market. The traditional home of phở is reputed to be the villages of Vân Cù and Dao Cù (or Giao Cù) in Đông Xuân commune, Nam Trực District, Nam Định Province.^{[18][19]}

Cultural historian and researcher Trịnh Quang Dũng believes that the popularization and origins of modern pho stemmed from the intersection of several historical and cultural factors in the early 20th century.^[20] These include improved availability of beef due to French demand, which in turn produced beef bones that were purchased by Chinese workers to make into a beef noodle similar to phở called ngưu nhục phấn (牛肉粉 or 牛腩粉) or ngau yuk fun.^{[20][21]} The Yunnan-style herbal beef soup is called niupahu (牛扒呼) or ngau paa fu in Cantonese.^[22] The demand for this dish was initially the greatest with workers from the provinces of Yunnan and Guangdong, who had an affinity for the dish due to its similarities to that of their homeland, which eventually popularized and familiarized this dish with the general population.^[21]

Phở was originally sold as a snack at dawn and dusk by street vendors, who shouldered mobile kitchens on carrying poles (gánh phở).^[23] From the pole hung two wooden cabinets, one housing a cauldron over a wood fire, the other storing noodles, spices, cookware, and space to prepare a bowl of phở. The heavy gánh was always shouldered by men.^[24] They kept their heads warm with distinctive felt hats called mũ phở.^[25]

Hanoi's first two fixed phở stands were a Vietnamese-owned Cát Tường on Cầu Gỗ Street and a Chinese-owned stand in front of Bờ Hồ tram stop. They were joined in 1918 by two more on Quạt Row and Đồng Row.^[26] Around 1925, a Vân Cù villager named Vạn opened the first "Nam Định style" pho stand in Hanoi.^[27] Peddler phở gánh declined in number around 1936–1946 in favor of stationary eateries.^[25]

Development

In the late 1920s, various vendors experimented with húng lìu, sesame oil, tofu, and even Lethocerus indicus extract (cà cuống). This "phở cải lương" failed to enter the mainstream.^{[26][28]}

Phở tái, served with rare beef, had been introduced by 1930. Chicken pho appeared in 1939, possibly because beef was not sold at the markets on Mondays and Fridays at the time.^[26]

With the partition of Vietnam in 1954, over a million people fled North Vietnam for South Vietnam. Phở, which was relatively less consumed in the South, suddenly became popular.^[19] No longer confined to northern culinary traditions, variations in meat and broth appeared, and additional garnishes, such as lime, mung bean sprouts (giá đỗ), culantro (ngò gai), cinnamon basil (húng quế), Hoisin sauce (tương đen), and hot Sriracha sauce (tương ớt) became standard fare.^{[12][19][26]} Phở tái also began to rival fully cooked phở chín in popularity. Migrants from the North similarly popularized bánh mì sandwiches.^[29]

Meanwhile, in North Vietnam, private phở restaurants were nationalized (mậu dịch quốc doanh)^[30] and began serving phở noodles made from old rice. Street vendors were forced to use noodles made of imported potato flour.^{[31][32]} Officially banned as capitalism, these vendors prized portability, carrying their wares on gánh and setting out plastic stools for customers.^[33]

During the so-called subsidy period following the Vietnam War, state-owned pho eateries served a meatless variety of the dish known as pilotless pho (phở không người lái),^[34] in reference to the U.S. Air Force's unmanned reconnaissance drones. The broth consisted of boiled water with MSG added for taste, as there were often shortages of various foodstuffs like meat and rice during that period.^[35] Bread or cold rice was often served as a side dish, leading to the present-day practice of dipping quẩy (deep-fried wheat flour dough) in pho.^[36]

Pho eateries were privatized as part of Đổi Mới. Many street vendors must still maintain a light footprint to evade police enforcing the street tidiness rules that replaced the ban on private ownership.^[33]

Globalization

A phở and bánh cuốn restaurant in Paris

In the aftermath of the Vietnam War, Vietnamese refugees brought phở to many countries. Restaurants specializing in phở appeared in numerous Asian neighborhoods and Little Saigons, such as in Paris and in major cities in the United States, Canada, and Australia.^{[37][38]} In 1980, the first of hundreds of phở restaurants opened in the Little Saigon in Orange County, California.^[39]

In the United States, phở began to enter the mainstream during the 1990s, as relations between the U.S. and Vietnam improved.^[38] At that time Vietnamese restaurants began opening quickly in Texas and California, spreading rapidly along the Gulf and West Coasts, as well as the East Coast and the rest of the country. During the 2000s, phở restaurants in the United States generated US$500 million in annual revenue, according to an unofficial estimate.^[40] Phở can now be found in cafeterias at many college and corporate campuses, especially on the West Coast.^[38]

The word "pho" was added to the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary in 2007.^[41] Phở is listed at number 28 on "World's 50 Most Delicious Foods", compiled by CNN Go in 2011.^[42] The Vietnamese Embassy in Mexico celebrated Phở Day on April 3, 2016, with Osaka Prefecture holding a similar commemoration the following day.^[43] Phở has been adopted by other Southeast Asian cuisines, including Lao and Hmong cuisine.^[8] It sometimes appears as "Phô" on menus in Australia.^[44]

Modern era

In recent decades, phở has evolved beyond its traditional form, with new variations emerging to cater to modern tastes and preferences. One notable innovation is phở cuốn,^[45] where the ingredients of phở are wrapped in fresh rice noodles, creating a new dish that has gained popularity in Hanoi.

Phở's influence has even extended into the cocktail scene, with bars like Nê offering phở-inspired cocktails that incorporate the soup's signature spices.^[46]

Additionally, chefs such as Peter Cuong Franklin have brought phở into the realm of fine dining, as exemplified by his Michelin-starred restaurant Anan Saigon, where phở is deconstructed into a multi-course meal.^[47]

The inaugural Day of Pho (Ngày của Phở) event was organized by Tuổi Trẻ newspaper and Acecook Vietnam in Ho Chi Minh City on December 12, 2017. At its launch, Tuổi Trẻ stated that it had proposed official recognition of December 12 as Day of Pho.^[48] The program was subsequently held annually as a cultural and culinary event promoting Vietnamese pho.^[49]

Etymology and origins

Reviews of 19th and 20th-century Vietnamese literature have found that pho entered the mainstream sometime in the 1910s. Georges Dumoutier's extensive 1907 account of Vietnamese cuisine omits any mention of phở.^[14] The word appears in a short story published in 1907.^[51] Nguyễn Công Hoan recalls its sale by street vendors in 1913.^[52] A 1931 dictionary is the first to define phở as a soup: "from the word phấn. A dish consisting of small slices of rice cake boiled with beef."^{[14][25][53]}

Pho
Vietnamese name
Vietnamese alphabet	phở
Chữ Nôm	頗 ^[50]

Possibly the earliest English-language reference to pho was in the book Recipes of All Nations, edited by Countess Morphy in 1935: In the book, pho is described as "an Annamese soup held in high esteem ... made with beef, a veal bone, onions, a bay leaf, salt, and pepper, and a small teaspoon of nuoc-mam (fish sauce)."^[54]

There are two prevailing theories on the origin of the word phở and, by extension, the dish itself. As author Nguyễn Dư notes, both questions are significant to Vietnamese identity.^[23]

From French

Some historians suggest a connection to the French due to the introduction of beef as a staple ingredient during French colonial rule.^[11] French settlers commonly ate beef, whereas Vietnamese traditionally ate pork and chicken and used cattle primarily as beasts of burden.^{[30][55]} Gustave Hue (1937) equates cháo phở to the French beef stew pot-au-feu (literally, "pot on the fire").^[14] Accordingly, Western sources generally maintain that phở is derived from pot-au-feu in both name and substance.^{[2][14][56]} However, several scholars dispute this etymology, pointing to the significant differences between the two dishes.^{[14][27][57]} Another suggestion of a separate origin is that phở in French has long been pronounced [fo] rather than [fø]: in Jean Tardieu's Lettre de Hanoi à Roger Martin Du Gard (1928), a soup vendor cries "Pho-ô!" in the street.^[32]

Many Hanoians explain that the word phở derives from French soldiers' ordering "feu" (fire) from gánh phở, referring to both the steam rising from a bowl of phở and the wood fire seen glowing from a gánh phở in the evening.^[25]

Food historian Erica J. Peters argues that the French has embraced phở in a way that overlooks its origins as a local improvisation, reinforcing "an idea that the French brought modern ingenuity to a traditionalist Vietnam".^[32] The connection between phở and the French culinary tradition remains widely debated but remains a prominent theory in discussions of its origins.^[11]

From Cantonese

Another possible origin links phở to Chinese influences. Hue and Eugène Gouin (1957) suggest that phở may be a shortened form of lục phở and that it is derived from ngầu nhục phẫn (Chinese: 牛肉粉; Cantonese Yale: ngàuh yuhk fán), which means "beef noodles". This dish was sold by Chinese immigrants in Hanoi. This etymology is supported by the 1931 dictionary definition of phở and the influence of Chinese culinary traditions, including the use of rice noodles and spices in the broth.^[14] ([ɲ] is an allophone of /l/ in some northern dialects of Vietnamese.)

Some scholars argue that phở (the dish) evolved from xáo trâu, a Vietnamese dish common in Hanoi at the turn of the century. Originally eaten by commoners near the Red River, it consisted of stir-fried strips of water buffalo meat served in broth atop rice vermicelli.^[58] Around 1908–1909, the shipping industry brought an influx of laborers. Vietnamese and Chinese cooks set up gánh to serve them xáo trâu but later switched to inexpensive scraps of beef^{[14][18]} set aside by butchers who sold to the French.^[59] Chinese vendors advertised this xáo bò by crying out, "Beef and noodles!" (Cantonese Yale: ngàuh yuhk fán; Vietnamese: ngầu nhục phẫn).^[27] Eventually, the street cry became "Meat and noodles!" (Chinese: 肉粉; Cantonese Yale: yuhk fán; Vietnamese: nhục phẫn), with the last syllable elongated.^{[19][25]} Nguyễn Ngọc Bích suggests that the final "n" was eventually dropped because of the similar-sounding phẫn (traditional Chinese: 糞; simplified Chinese: 粪; lit. 'excrement').^{[13][60]} The French author Jean Marquet refers to the dish as "Yoc feu!" in his 1919 novel Du village-à-la cité.^[59] This is likely what the Vietnamese poet Tản Đà calls "nhục-phở" in "Đánh bạc" ("Gambling"), written around 1915–1917.^{[23][57]}

Ingredients and preparation

Phở is served in a bowl with a specific cut of flat rice noodles in clear beef broth, with thin cuts of beef (steak, fatty flank, lean flank, brisket). Variations feature slow-cooked tendons, tripe, or meatballs in southern Vietnam. Chicken pho is made using the same spices as beef, but the broth is made using chicken bones and meat, as well as some internal organs of the chicken, such as the heart, the undeveloped eggs, and the gizzard.^{[61][62]}

When eating at phở stalls in Vietnam, customers are generally asked which parts of the beef they would like and how they want it done.

Beef parts include:

- Tái băm: Rare beef patty, minced by a chopping knife right before serving
- Tái: Medium rare meat
- Tái sống: Rare meat
- Tái chín: Mixture of medium rare meat and pre-cooked well-done meat, the default serving in most pho restaurants
- Tái lăn: Meat, sauteed before adding to the soup
- Tái nạm: Mix of medium rare meat with flank
- Nạm: Flank cut
- Nạm gầu: Brisket
- Gân: Tendons
- Sách: Beef tripe
- Tiết: Boiled beef blood
- Bò viên: Beef ball
- Trứng tái: Poached chicken egg (served in a separate bowl)

For chicken phở, options might include:

- Đùi gà: Chicken thigh
- Lườn gà: Chicken breast
- Lòng gà: Chicken innards
- Trứng non: Immature chicken eggs
- Trứng chần: chicken egg yolk

Noodles

The freshly made rice noodles which are usually used are called bánh phở tươi, sợi phở tươi or for short, phở tươi in Vietnamese, while the dried rice noodles are called bánh phở khô, sợi phở khô or for short, phở khô.^{[63][64][65]} In North America, the semi-dried pho noodles are labeled on the packaging as bánh phở tươi (fresh pho noodles).^{[66][67]} Pho noodles are usually medium-wide; however, people from different regions of Vietnam prefer different widths.

Broth

The soup for beef phở is generally made by simmering beef bones, oxtails, flank steak, charred onion, charred ginger, and spices. For a more intense flavor, the bones may still have beef on them. Chicken bones also work and produce a similar broth. Seasonings can include Saigon cinnamon or other kinds of cinnamon as alternatives (may be used usually in stick form, sometimes in powder form in pho restaurant franchises overseas), star anise, roasted ginger, roasted onion, black cardamom, coriander seed, fennel seed, and clove.^[68] The broth takes several hours to make.^[62] For chicken phở, only the meat and bones of the chicken are used in place of beef and beef bone. The remaining spices remain the same, but the charred ginger can be omitted since its function in beef phở is to subdue the quite strong smell of beef.

The spices, often wrapped in cheesecloth or a soaking bag to prevent them from floating all over the pot, usually contain cloves, star anise, coriander seed, fennel, cinnamon, black cardamom, ginger, and onion.

A typical phở spice packet, sold at many Asian food markets, containing a soaking bag plus various necessary dry spices. The exact amount differs with each bag.

Careful cooks often roast ginger and onion over an open fire for about a minute before adding them to the stock, to bring out their full flavor. They also skim off all the impurities that float to the top while cooking; this is the key to a clear broth. Nước mắm (fish sauce) is added toward the end.

Garnishes

Different regions have different ways of eating pho that suit their taste and practice. The Northern pho is typically served with scallions, onions, and cilantro (coriander leaves). The Southern variant also adds Thai basil and bean sprouts. Thai chili peppers, lime wedges, fish sauce, chili oil, hot chili sauce (such as Sriracha sauce), pickled garlic (Northern style), or hoisin sauce (Southern style) may be added to taste as accompaniments.^{[69][62][70]} The Central pho is more special. On the table, they prepare pickled papaya, and sate sauce.^[71]

Several ingredients not generally served with phở may be ordered by request. Extra-fatty broth (nước béo) can be ordered and comes with scallions to sweeten it. A popular side dish ordered upon request is hành dấm, or vinegared white onions.

Styles of pho

Regional variants

There are several regional variants of pho in Vietnam, particularly divided between "Northern phở" (phở Bắc) or "Hanoi phở" (phở Hà Nội), and "Southern phở" (phở Nam) or "Saigon pho" (phở Sài Gòn). Northern Vietnamese phở uses a savoury, clear broth, blanched whole green onion, and garnishes offered generally include only diced green onion and cilantro, pickled garlic, chili sauce and quẩy. The Northern pho is often described as subtle and light on spices while having a deep savory taste from beef bones. Side dishes with the Northern pho are poached eggs (in the pho broth, served in a separate bowl) and fried dough, which can be either chewy or crunchy.^{[72][73]} On the other hand, southern Vietnamese phở broth is sweeter and cloudier, and is consumed with bean sprouts, fresh sliced chili, hoisin sauce, and a greater variety of fresh herbs. Phở may be served with either phở noodles or kuy teav noodles (hủ tiếu).^[74] The variations in meat, broth, and additional garnishes such as lime, bean sprouts, ngò gai (culantro), húng quế (Thai basil), and tương đen (hoisin sauce), tương ớt (chili sauce) appear to be innovations made by or introduced to the South.^[12] Another style of northern phở is phở Nam Định from Nam Định city which uses more fish sauce in the broth and wider noodles.^[75] Other provincial variations exist where pho is served with delicacy meats other than beef or chicken, such as duck, buffalo, goat, or veal.

Other phở dishes

Phở has many variants, including many dishes bearing the name "phở",^[76] which are not all soup-based:

- Phở sốt vang: Wine-sauced pho, with beef stewed in red wine.
- Phở tái lăn: pho with rare beef quickly stir-fried before serving.
- Phở xào: sauteed pho noodles with beef and vegetables.
- Phở áp chảo: similar to phở xào but stir-fried with more oil and gets more burned.
- Phở cuốn: rolled pho, with ingredients rolled up and eaten as a gỏi cuốn.
- Phở trộn: mixed pho, noodles and fresh herbs and dressings, served as a salad.
- Phở chấm: dipping pho, with the noodles and broth served separately.
- Phở chiên phồng: This variant is the same as the previous but without eggs and looks like pillows
- Phở chiên trứng: This means a variant that pho is deep-fried with eggs.
- Lẩu phở: Using deconstructed phở ingredients and eaten as a hotpot.

Other local variances or dishes called phở:

- Phở chua: meaning sour phở is a delicacy from Lạng Sơn city.^[77]
- Phở khô Gia Lai: an unrelated noodle dish from Gia Lai, similar to hủ tiếu.
- Phở sắn: a tapioca noodle dish from Quế Sơn District of Quảng Nam.
- Phở sa tế: phở noodles with chili and peanut sauce and venison meat, came from Teochew immigrants in southern Vietnam.
- Phở vịt: duck phở, a specialty of Cao Bằng and Lạng Sơn provinces.
- Phở gan cháy: meaning grilled liver pho, a specialty found in Bắc Ninh city.
- Phở trâu: Buffalo pho, a specialty of Nam Định and Hà Nam provinces.

- Phở dê: Goat pho, a specialty of Ninh Bình province.
- Phở đỏ: made from red rice, a specialty of Hà Giang highland.
- Phở xú chấm: a dish served with grilled pork, a specialty of Nam Định city.
- Phở Lào or Laos phở is the Vietnamese name of Khao piak sen.

Vietnamese beef soup can also refer to bún bò Huế, which is a spicy beef noodle soup associated with Huế in central Vietnam.

Outside Vietnam

After the Fall of Saigon in 1975, the Philippines welcomed refugees into its territories, resulting in thousands of Vietnamese from southern Vietnam taking shelter on the Filipino island of Palawan. The Vietnamese immigrants brought with them part of their culture which influenced the Filipinos of the island, and vice versa. A notable culinary legacy is a pho-like Filipino dish popular in Palawan island that locals call chao long (not to be confused with the Vietnamese porridge called cháo lòng). The Filipino chao long is a noodle dish, which is a combination of broth, protein (beef, pork, and/or chicken), rice noodles, mung bean sprouts, and basil leaves. It is accompanied by a Filipino citrus called calamansi and served with a bread similar to Vietnamese bánh mì, which the locals refer to as "French bread".^{[78][79]}

Notable restaurants

Famous phở shops in Hanoi are Phở Bát Đàn, Phở Thìn Bờ Hồ, Phở Thìn Lò Đúc, Phở 10 Lý Quốc Sư. In 2016, BBC noted Pho 10 Ly Quoc Su to be among the best pho addresses in Vietnam.^[72] Phở Thìn Lò Đúc has also opened foreign branches in Australia, Japan and the U.S.^[80]

Famous phở shops in Saigon included Phở Bắc Hải, Phở Công Lý, Phở Tàu Bay, Phở Tàu Thủy, and Phở Bà Đậu. Pasteur Street (phố phở Pasteur) was a street famous for its beef phở, while Hien Vuong Street (phố phở Hiền Vương) was known for its chicken phở.^[81] At Phở Bình, American soldiers dined as National Liberation Front agents planned the Tết Offensive just upstairs.^{[82][83]} Nowadays in Ho Chi Minh City, well-known restaurants include: Phở Hùng, Phở Hòa Pasteur,^[84] and Phở 2000, which U.S. President Bill Clinton visited in 2000.^{[38][55]}

Tables at phở restaurants abroad are set with a variety of condiments, including Sriracha sauce, and eating utensils.

One of the largest phở chains in Vietnam is Pho 24, a subsidiary of Highlands Coffee, with 60 locations in Vietnam and 20 abroad.^[85]

In the U.S.

The largest phở chain in the United States is Phở Hòa, which operates over 70 locations in seven countries.^{[38][86][87]} A similar restaurant named Pho 75 serves in the Washington, D.C., and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, areas in the United States.^[88] Numbers in the restaurant name are "lucky" numbers for the owners: culturally lucky numbers or to mark a date in Vietnam or their personal history.^[89]

Many phở restaurants in the United States offer oversized helpings with names such as "train phở" (phở xe lửa), "airplane phở" (phở tàu bay), or "California phở" (phở Ca Li).^{[23][25][36]} Some restaurants have offered a phở eating challenge, with prizes for finishing as much as 10 pounds (4.5 kg) of phở in one sitting,^[90] or have auctioned special versions costing $5,000.^{[91][92]}

It is made with beef, a veal bone, onions, a bay leaf, salt, and pepper, and a small teaspoon of nuoc-man [sic], a typically Annamese condiment that is used in practically all their dishes. It is made from a kind of brine exuding from decaying fish, and in former days six years were required before it had reached full maturity. But in modern times the preparation has been put on the market and can be made by chemical processes in a very short time."
